

GRIFFITH SATISFIES PREMIER ON IRELAND

Answers Six Questions Explaining Necessity for De Valera Agreement.

WAR MENACE IS ENDED

Leader Returns to Ireland and Lloyd George Goes to Wales.

ULSTER FOR USE OF ARMY

Churchill Promises It to Protect Border, but Not for Sectarian Fight.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK HERALD. Copyright, 1922, by THE NEW YORK HERALD. New York Herald Bureau, London, June 2.

The Irish negotiations here took a distinct tone for the better to-night. The danger of either civil war in Ireland or British reoccupation for the moment has been eliminated. Arthur Griffith and his advisers to-night drafted a letter to Premier Lloyd George answering six definite questions in such a satisfactory manner that Premier Lloyd George went to Wales to rest and Griffith to Ireland to consult his colleagues, and it was announced that the negotiations would be resumed Tuesday.

Meanwhile Griffith is believed to have received favorable reports from Michael Collins, head of the Provisional Government, who preceded him to Ireland last night. Collins's mission admittedly was to try to get Eamon de Valera to interpret his signature to the truce pact in such a fashion as to meet the views which the British Cabinet expressed in the course of the conference.

The representations of Griffith and Collins with regard to the necessity for the De Valera-Collins pact are understood finally to have been convincing in the form in which they were embodied in to-night's letter. This, it is said, made it clear that the coming panel election was merely a means to an end. In private conversations the Dublin delegates had explained how the destruction of a single ballot box would invalidate the election in an entire district and had shown how impossible it was under existing conditions to protect boxes in scattered precincts. Hence the necessity for an agreement with the De Valerists. It is the belief of the provisionalists that once the first election has been held to comply with the terms of the treaty they will then be able to hold an absolutely free election within twelve months.

This understanding, together with the meeting of the Free State Constitution and its relation to the treaty, it is reported to-night, forms the basis of the six questions which the provisionalists answered satisfactorily. The situation is by no means out of the woods yet, but persons familiar with the negotiations believe a settlement is in sight.

Meanwhile Ulster still remains the rock about which Irish affairs ebb and flow. The entire day was spent in sending letters back and forth between Sir James Craig and the Marquis of Londonderry on one side and Winston Churchill and the British Cabinet on the other. It was understood to-night that a final understanding is about reached between them.

The Ulsterites are pressing for further liberty of action to be granted to the commander of the British troops on the Ulster border, and Mr. Churchill and the Cabinet are presenting in a manner much stronger than might be expected the view that sectarian warfare in Belfast must cease. Both Sir James Craig and the Marquis of Londonderry are understood to have given pledges that they would try once more to quiet affairs in that city.

Mr. Churchill assured them that they would get the full aid of British forces to protect the border against southern menace but refused to let the troops participate in the sort of fighting now going on in Belfast or to cross into Free State territory.

FREE STATE MAY ALTER POLICY TOWARD ULSTER

British Don't Admit Constitution Conforms to Treaty.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK HERALD. Copyright, 1922, by THE NEW YORK HERALD. New York Herald Bureau, Dublin, June 2.

The return of Arthur Griffith from the London conference is eagerly awaited, as it is expected the Provisional Government may change its policy toward Ulster as the result of impressions received at the London conversations, together with the recent statements of Sir James Craig, Premier of Ulster. The friends of Griffith and Michael Collins believe that both prefer a peaceful policy in dealing with the north of Ireland, although the results of Collins's arrangement with Premier Craig on March 13 are regarded here as being highly unsatisfactory.

It is understood here that the British Cabinet disagreed with the contention of the Irish delegates that the new constitution conformed with the spirit and letter of the treaty.

The constitution is based on Clause II of the treaty, providing that "subject to provisions hereinafter set out, the position of the Irish Free State in relation to the Imperial Parliament, the Government and otherwise shall be that of the Dominion of Canada, and the law, practice and constitutional usage governing the relationship of the crown or representative of the crown and the Imperial Parliament to the Dominion of Canada shall govern their relationship to the Irish Free State."

The Irish argument hinges on the contention that Canada now has an equal status with England under the present constitutional usage. They say that Canada is now a sovereign nation and that the clauses in the Canadian constitution of 1867 giving the British Parliament the right to veto Canadian laws have now become inoperative. They also cite recent declarations by British and Canadian Ministers showing that Canada is a sovereign nation.

Regarding Ireland's foreign relations, the Irish argument points to the fact that English statesmen admitted that Canada had the right to send a representative to Washington equal in rank to those of other nations, though Canada has not availed herself of this right. But Ireland proposes to avail herself of it.
